WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA:

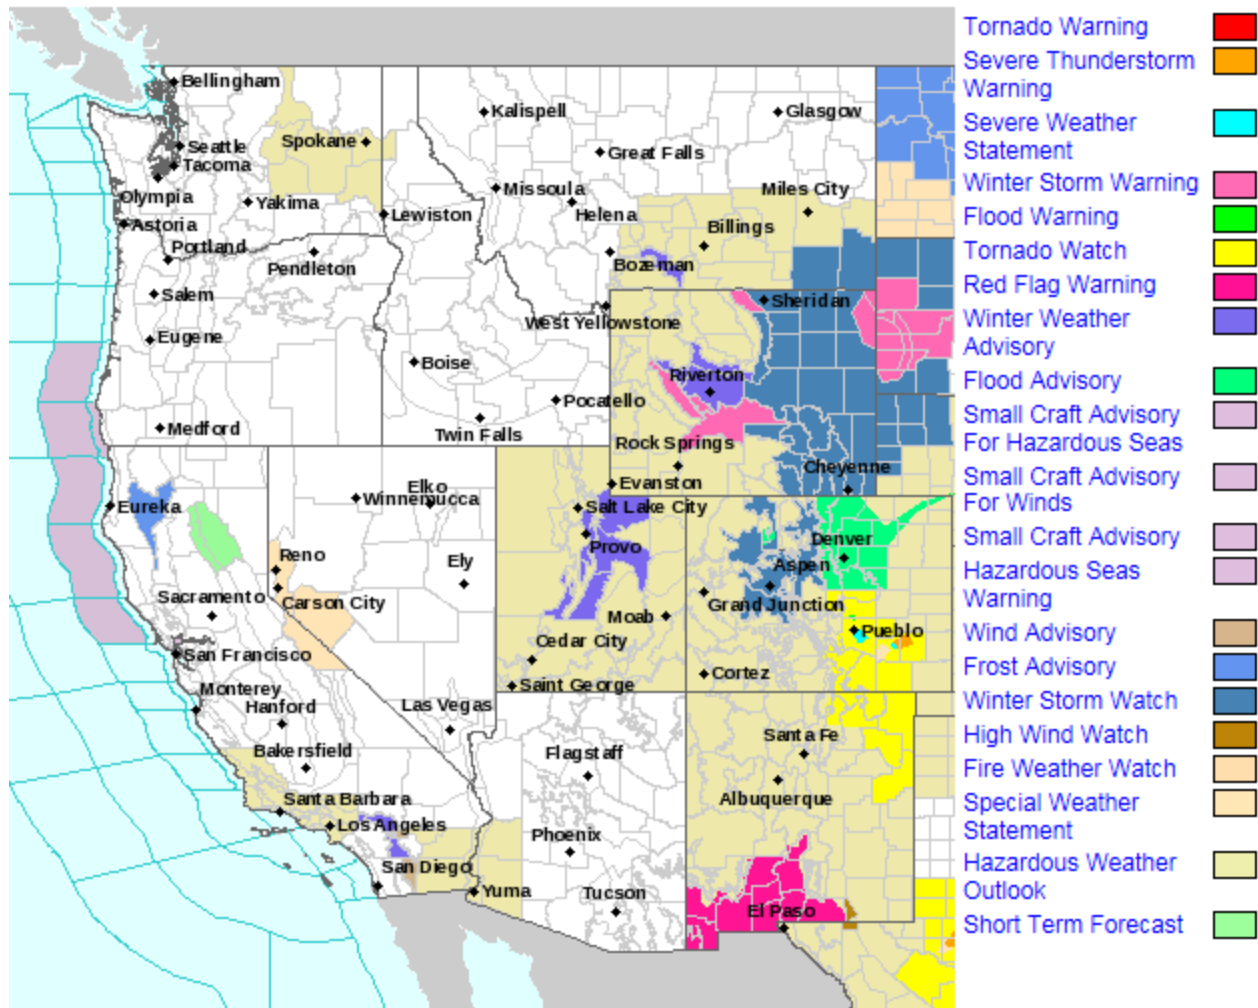

The center of the low pressure that dropped south across North California Thursday had turned southeast overnight, and was located a little east of the southern Sierra Nevada Friday morning. Much of Northern California will be under a drying North to Northeast flow aloft today, being in the Northwest quadrant from the gradually exiting low. For many areas, surface winds will be lighter than on the past two days, except Northeast California could still see a day of fairly widespread, moderate-plus north winds. There is just enough upslope component (east side of the northern Sierra) to keep a final day of shower or isolated thunderstorm chances from Lassen County southward today. The weekend sees drying and some warming for nearly all southern to eastern sections of North California, though in the northwest that will probably be confined to Saturday and early Sunday. This is because larger-scale governing pattern remains unsettled, and another system from the Pacific will send mainly light precipitation chances into the northwest and/or far north Sunday evening through Tuesday. Then, a moister low looks probable to develop west of California midweek, before possibly bring widespread wetting showers next Thursday or Friday.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA:

A strong area of low pressure currently over Southern California will bring scattered showers and thunderstorms to the region away from the Central Coast through this evening. Most locations will receive less than a quarter inch of additional rainfall, but the Sierra and San Diego County will receive an additional quarter to half inch. The snow level will be between 5,000 and 6,000 feet. Westerly winds of 15 to 25 mph with gusts to 40 mph will surface across the desert passes through tonight. Temperatures will remain well below normal today, with 40s to low 50s in the mountains and upper 50s and 60s in the valleys. Temperatures will warm this weekend and be near normal by Sunday as brief high pressure builds into California. An area of low pressure will form off the Pacific Northwest Monday and then move inland Tuesday bringing a little cooler temperatures to the region. Isolated afternoon showers and thunderstorms will form over the Sierra Saturday through Tuesday and over the San Bernardino National Forest on Saturday. Another strong low pressure area will move down the West Coast Wednesday through the end of next week causing temperatures to remain below normal. At this time, it looks as though this low pressure area will bring scattered showers and thunderstorms to most of the region Thursday and Friday.
